Tomorrow, I would like to speak mainly to this article:

- Acknowledging the many hearts and minds behind the milestone.
- Recommending that we do not become complacent [this is halftime not fulltime] and that stringent safeguards are imposed on the consent holder.
- Highlighting the productive work of the WMC and the KIWA group and that this needs to be continued.
- The wastewater overflows effects are summarised by the KIWA Group as follows:
 - The practice of allowing wastewater overflows is unacceptable to tangata whenua as it affects them deeply spiritually, socially, and culturally.
 - The wastewater overflows have a significant negative effect on tangata whenua, in terms of cultural identity, mauri, tikanga, wairua, kaitiakitanga, the practice of customary rights and protocols, and substantially diminishing or making it impossible to practice some fundamental elements of Māori society and culture.
 - Human wastewater, particularly containing mortuary wastewater, mixing with natural water is extreme tapu for tangata whenua.
 - Tangata whenua consider that they have not been able to exercise their role as kaitiaki in terms of the wastewater overflows into the city's rivers.
- That the KIWA Group continue to flag that the mauri of Turanganui a Kiwa will not be restored until the following are addressed:
 - Overflows of raw sewage into our rivers and sea are stopped
 - The marine outfall pipe is turned off
 - The Port stops polluting the Bay [inner harbour to dredging spoils]
 - The leaky landfill at Te Pa o Kahu is plugged
 - The ineffective oxidation ponds at Te Karaka are fixed

MILESTONE BYLAW

Trade Waste Bylaw 'respects dignity of our deceased': Ruru

by Alice Angeloni

A "RESPECT and dignity" bylaw has been passed in Gisborne banning the culturally abhorrent practice of sending mortuary waste to sea.

Gisborne district councillors voted in favour of the Trade Waste Bylaw 2021 yesterday morning, moments before the Government announced its sweeping three waters reform proposal.

Ian Ruru, who leads the KIWA group set up to provide cultural advice and technical support to the district council, said it was a big day for water reforms and Te Mana o te Wai — the health and wellbeing of water.

"It's official, our respect and dignity bylaw was passed," Mr Ruru said.

He acknowledged "the many hearts and minds that guided us to this nationally significant milestone".

"It's a first for New Zealand and I'm sure other regions will follow."

Tangata whenua and the wider community of Tairāwhiti have long petitioned for mortuary waste to be separated from the public wastewater system because it is deemed "culturally abhorrent" for such waste to be discharged into Turanganui a Kiwa/Poverty Bay.

Mortuary waste is made up of arterial blood and chemicals that mostly arise through the embalming process.

Plans are for mortuary waste from the region's funeral home to be trucked into Taruheru Cemetery and disposed of through a Wisconsin mound system.

"I acknowledge the many that have driven this kaupapa over the decades and the significance of the outcome that respects the dignity of our deceased and protects Te Mana o te Wai," Mr Ruru said.

It comes as the Government announced its three waters proposal — to transfer drinking water, wastewater and stormwater infrastructure responsibilities from 67 councils to four large publicly-owned entities.

Arowai, said three waters reforms were a step change for New Zealand and Maori rights and interests.

Under the Government's proposal, mana whenua and local government representatives would have equal joint oversight of the four new water entities.

"While the big news out of Wellington signals huge, New Zealand-wide water reforms, Gisborne has been quietly doing its part to give effect to Te Mana o Te Wai."

Cabinet papers on the three waters proposal said the new water entities would have the powers and responsibilities relating to trade waste and obligations to operate three waters services in compliance with resource consents.
